Common Financial Mistakes—Part 1

As an entrepreneur, you're hardwired to enjoy a greater level of risk than the average person. But, if there's one thing you don't want to risk – especially in today's economy – it's your personal financial security.

The unfortunate reality is that small business owners often make critical financial mistakes when financing the launch, operation or growth of their businesses, mistakes that can severely limit the amount of funding available for their business and, ultimately, jeopardize their family's financial well-being.

You may not even realize that you've made a mistake until one day you find out that you can't qualify for a mortgage. Or you can't get the to-die-for financing offered on the new car you want. Or you find you can't secure a credit card for your small business. Or worse yet, your business runs out of cash and you can't get the financing you need to keep it afloat.

Consequences like these are often the result of approaching your business without a strategy for responsible business development, with a Technician's mindset rather than the Entrepreneurial mindset. While The Technician in you has an important part to play, the financial health of your business is about more than just "doing the math;" it's about taking the perspective of The Entrepreneur and thinking and acting with a long-term strategy. It's about knowing that the decision you make today will have consequences in the future.

Remember, a successful business – an E-Myth'd business – is an asset that fuels the path towards more life. Getting your financial house in order is critical to growing your business asset and obtaining financial freedom!

The Biggest Mistake You Can Make

The hands-down biggest and most common mistake small business owners and entrepreneurs make is using personal credit to finance their businesses. Common examples include:

- Paying for business expenses with your personal credit cards
- "Borrowing" money from your personal savings, checking, retirement or other investment accounts to "invest" in your business

- Obtaining personal loans to finance your business expenses

By using your valuable personal credit for business expenses, you run the risk of:

- Lowering your personal credit score. When you personally guarantee business-related financing, the lender will require a personal credit check. Every time an inquiry into your credit history is made, your personal credit score takes a hit. The lower your score drops, the harder it is to secure financing, especially financing with the most favorable terms.
- Reducing the amount of credit available for personal use. The more credit you have personally guaranteed for your business, the higher your debt-to-income ratio soars, and the less that lenders will be willing to give you for personal use. Signing that loan for your business could prevent you from getting a mortgage on the new house you plan to buy a year from now.
