The Personal Touch

The First Step Is Recognition

The initial step is to recognize the reality. What results do you achieve in your business? Yes, you created patterns of behavior (systems) that you've followed in order to achieve a degree of business success. You pride yourself on your abilities. You enjoy the fact that in your growing organization, nobody has the same personal touch with the customers that you have. I mentioned rainmaker status above, for often this is how this pride in the personal touch shows up; you feel recognized and special for your personal ability to achieve great results.

Of course, there's nothing wrong with being good at what you do! It's fantastic! You've found a particular way of doing business that has made you successful. But here's the key concept: if the business is totally dependent on you – on how you do things – you'll never be able to get away from the business. You can't sell a business when you are the business. You can't take a vacation from the business because when you go, the business goes too.

Personalization is the Key

At E-Myth we know that the personal touch that you've mastered can be re-created as a system. A personalized system that communicates your values, vision, purpose and standards -- the heart of your company culture. Having a Strategic Objective and a set of "rules of the game" (your defined way of doing business), gives you the framework for creating the culture and necessary processes for your employees to achieve those same results.

So you must first create a clear vision and value statement, back it up with standards and structure that reflect your purpose and intention, then begin observing and analyzing the way that you personalize the relationship with your customers. Next, check any idea you have that it can't be done, otherwise, you'll fall back on the old way of just doing it all yourself.

Intense Observation and Self-Scrutiny

What will your systems look like for replicating the way you do business and interact with clients? It's beyond the scope of this article to describe the process completely, but to begin, try capturing each leverage point of customer interaction. Then, create a repeatable system around that interaction. Become alert to interactions that you handle, especially those that, if asked about how you did it, you'd simply say "I just knew," or "I did it, no problem." Let others observe you in the midst of these activities and see if they can help you pick apart the actual steps you took to create that particular response.

Pulling It Together

As suggested, the first step is often the most difficult... recognizing that the way that you're conducting business may prohibit your growth. Realizing that because you feel you are the only one who can deliver the client experience in the way that you do, you're the only one who can do the work of the business. Once you make a commitment to freeing yourself of that, don't rest until you've created processes and systems around everything you do that creates that personal touch.

In this era of customized marketing, everybody wants to receive specialized treatment during the entire sales process and throughout every aspect of client fulfillment. Create personalized systems that make for that amazing WOW customer experience! If you do it right, your customers will continue to feel special long after you've turned the reins over to another or exited the company all together, since now your personal touch is part of the system solution.
